Music up and under: guitar and ballad.

Announce: Brad Strause lost his sight when he was forty. One of the first things he did was get his guitar out of the closet and start playing.

Strause: Music for me was a way to reconnect with people at workshops and lessons and music camps. It was a great way to not only express myself creatively, but also to reconnect.

Announce: Strause says artists with disabilities have much to contribute.

Strause: Isn't the arts all about peeling back the superficial and trying to express the things that are almost inexpressible? And I think people with disabilities have had such a unique and different experience, and often very profound, when they learn how to express that artistically, they really do have something to contribute.

Announce: The arts. They're for everyone.
